Adobe often updates its applications—and, by extension, their formats and interfaces, with each new version. But not all its updates are visible to end users like you and I. Updating your software doesn't just make it keep pace with today's trends; it helps Adobe when it goes to market (to gauge interest in, and potential sales of, new features, updates, and products related to recent industry trends and anxieties). But if you're in the market for a new computer, any updates that are made invisible to you first will be invisible to any software distributor that's selling your hardware—and your new software. A few weeks ago, I was working on a wedding shoot and finishing up some resizing of my clients' photoshoot to fit onto an 8×10" paper piece (in order to ensure that the final print would look good in their frame or at their wedding). Because I had to zoom in on my images for the final crop prior to printing, it took a while. I was trying to beat the deadline to get the client the 8×10" poster and "waiting it out" was no option. I had two options: 1) reduce the resolution and size to something more manageable to resize and 2) reduce the resolution and size and use a big white border to indicate the printing process. But, you know, it was painfully obvious that I never had time to figure out how to resize images to less than 300 DPI, thousands of pixels per inch, and fit a poster with a white border on an 8×10" piece of paper. It was an easy choice, for me: I had a much bigger problem to focus on. 933d7f57e6
